Letters Written By Lord Chesterfield to His S (Classic Reprint) Philip Dormer Stanhope Chesterfield
It is still worth while attempting to solve the problem which is offered to us by his inscrutability, not only on its own account, but because Lord Chesterfield is a representative spirit of the eighteenth century. Philip Dormer Stanhope did not experience in his youth either of those influences which are so important in the lives of most of us. His mother died before he could know her, and his father was one of those living nonentities whom his biographer sums up in saying that We know little more of him than that he was an Earl of Chesterfield I ndeed, what influence there may have been was of a negative kind, for he had, if anything, an avowed dislike for his son. Naturally under these conditions he had to endure the slings and arrows of fortune alone and uncounselled. One domestic influence was allowed him in the mother of his mother, whose face still looks out at us from the pages of Dr. Maty, engraved by Bartolozzi from the original of Sir Peter Lely a face sweet, intellectual, open over the title of Gertrude Savile, Marchioness of Halifax. She it was who imdertook, at any rate to some small degree, the rearing of her daughters child Lord Chesterfield is rather a Savile than a Stanhope. He heard French from a Normandy nurse in his cradle and he received, when he grew a little older, such a The greatest English writer of the present day thus sums yp the eighteenth century: An age of which Hoadly was the bishop, and Walpole the minister, and Pope the poet, and Chesterfield the wit, and Tillotson the ruling doctor.
